Although the author presents this hypothesis of acquired diabetes epidemic as one among many explanations, it strongly informs many aspects of her ethnographic approach, including the decision to study diabetes among pregnant women and not other members of the Pima population. She argues that high diabetes prevalence among the Pima has many causes but is not inevitable. The pattern could be reversed by overcoming the sociocultural factors that lead to elevated in utero glucose levels. Read Online or Download Diabetes among the Pima: Stories of Survival PDF.
